THE EXAMINER, SAN FRANCISCO: SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 16, 1889. 5

WITNESSES FROM WALES.

They Tell of Thomas Williams, Alias Blythe's, Visits Home.

PROOFS IN PHOTOGRAPHS AND WRITING.

How Williams Came to Change His Name and Where He Got It—Story of the Man Who Helped Smuggle Him on Board the Antelope—Establishing Blythe's Identity.

Is the Blythe case yesterday, Attorney Goodfellow continued reading the depositions of the Williams heirs. Ann Lloyd Morris, sister of Kyffyn Jones, the great Welsh friend of Williams, alias Blythe, said that Tom often spoke of his California experience and of his relatives when visiting her father's house in Mold in 1875. When he left there for Paris he sent her a photograph of himself in a letter signed Tom Williams. The picture is undoubtedly that of Blythe.

Ann Hughes, a widow in Mold, identified a photograph of Blythe as the Tom Williams who visited her husband in 1872. Tom and her husband had been school-fellows, and spent long hours in talking over old times.

Edward Gooch, deacon of the Methodist Church in Mold, related the incident of Tom Williams dropping a sovereign in the contribution plate.

SMUGGLED ABOARD THE ANTELOPE.

William Williams, a solicitor of Cheshire, helped smuggle Williams aboard the Antelope, and tells the whole story of the change of names.

"I knew T. H. Blythe," he deposes, "but his true name was Tom Williams. We were chums as far back as 1847, when he went into the Cheshire Dairy. I'd go around there evenings, and we'd drink tea and play cards. When he got into financial difficulties, in 1849, and determined to run off to California, I helped him in his preparations. On one of the evenings he failed to keep his appointment with me. When I next met him he explained that he had passed the night with young Blythe. He said he admired the name and was going to adopt it when he went to California.

"William Roberts, who worked for Tom in the Cheshire Dairy, and to whom he sold the business when he left for America, and who farming, knows Tom well, has marked them 'T. H. Blythe.' The change of names was made at that date.

"Charles Magrow and I went aboard the Antelope with Tom. When I saw the luggage with the new name I said: 'There are some of your things, Williams.' Hush! told your tongue,' he answered. 'Go ashore and remember that my name is Blythe and I am not Tom Williams till 1872.'

BAD ASSUMED THE SAME BLYTHE.

"When he called on me in Liverpool in that year he said he had taken the name of Blythe and had a handsome property in San Francisco that was bringing him in an annual income of £700. He was leaving for a Mr. Drew then to transfer some of his old Liverpool property to his sister Sarah. I advised him to give her the money himself instead of by will.

"When he told me of his success in England and America I told him he must not come to my house any more. He said he would call at my office, for if I called at his hotel I should be sure to hear the name of Williams, and all his friends there knew him as Blythe.

"He asked me if I had noticed a publication of his death in the papers, in which he offered £500 to the one who wrote the best essay on the English language. I asked him why he did not leave it to his family, and he said it would turn their heads.

"Miss Louisa Hoe, to whom he was engaged when briefly England in 1849, and whom he married in 1852, is dead, I have read. I learned afterwards that this was not so at that time. She sent all her letters to him through me, and I addressed them to 'Thomas Williams, San Francisco.' He never wrote to her."
