THE PREVENTION OF INUNDATIONS.

The recent destructive floods in the Mississippi valley have naturally caused the methods of protection hitherto adopted to be called in question. Indeed there is growing disposition to condemn the levee system as having broken down. This verdict, however, cannot stand, for though the Mississippi levees have given way this year, it cannot be forgotten that they have proved eminently serviceable for many preceding years, nor must it be ignored that no known system can be devised which will give absolute guarantees against similar disasters. It is no doubt easily explicable that the injured communities should in the first burst of disappointment and despondency denounce the levee system as a complete failure, but before the United States Government In New York Government bonds are quoted at | decides to give up that system it will require proof of the possibility of improving the river defenses of the Mississippi valley. The Nile and the Po have long been the favorite models for embankment engineering, but the weakness of all attempts to infer from the treatment of these rivers the course to be followed elsewhere, consists in the fact that the circumstances are not alike. The Po and the Nile have been treated with a single eve to the local requirements, and that is the only rational mode of proceeding in such cases. Because longitudinal It is reported from Paris that the Monetary Con- or lateral dykes, or broad or narrow embankments, suit an Italian or Egyptian locality, it does not follow that they Captain Kline, of the Eighteenth Infantry, is will suit an American river system. It has been suggested since the recent floods that it would be better The portrait of Bradlaugh—the thorn in the side to separate the embankments more wideof the British Parliament-together with a brief ly; but this would involve the sacrifice of vast areas of valuable property, since it would necessitate building the levees behind many of the plantations, instead of in front of them. It is clear that this Wilde's cult, the criticism leveled at his sacrifice of property might be so great as to negative a treatment otherwise desirable. In the same way it is impossible to consider the question of a river's affluents temptible, and this tendency is the only without also considering its outlets. For explanation of the existing fashions in it may be doubtful whether it will be better to treat it for inundations by checking ing the capacity of its outlets, or by both
