THE GERMANS SPEAK

For Cleveland, Democracy and Their Fatherland.

NEW YORK, September 29.—The Academy of Music was crowded to-night, as were all the streets in the vicinity, on the occasion of the German Democratic mass meeting. The interior of the building was handsomely decorated and there was a considerable display of fireworks. General Franz Sigel called the meeting to order. Among the Vice-Presidents were: George Bancroft, Peter Cooper, Abram S. Hewitt, John Bigelow, Peter Dodge, Henry Hilton, Herbert Jr., and David G. Yeaglin. General Franz Sigel in his opening speech said: "We don't believe in protection, but in free trade principles. We want to see the necks of the party which looks up to the Tweed ring and appears all others down. We want to see the party which is a stage to the highest officials of the administration, but a thorough working out of all corrupt officeholders. May the victorious Democratic party, with its glorious standard bearer, Cleveland."

Oswald Ottendorfer, the editor of the Staats Zeitung, was chosen President of the meeting, and was received with cheers. Every mention by Ottendorfer of the name of Cleveland was greeted with applause and cheers. Ottendorfer closed his speech by saying of Cleveland: "You have a man as plain as he is unpretending; a man who believes not a moment in the power of money, but in the intelligence and decency as soon as they come together. A man who cannot be intimidated by the cry of 'Free trade and English gold,' which has been used to frighten the people from their own interests. A man who cannot be bought by the money of the monopolists, but who will be elected by the honest votes of the people of this country."

JAMES A. PIKE

Was next introduced, and was greeted by the following letter, which he read. The letter was addressed to Mr. Pike, and was dated Friday, and the premier was that on that day he received the following letter:

"Dear Sir:—Your friend Gladstone was compelled on Saturday, which the jury met, Miss Cleveland, the sister of the President, and that he was compelled to remain in session on evidence already taken. The jury stood in the room of the Grand Jury, and stood in the room of the Grand Jury, and stood before a petit jury, for which they are needed to have Pyle as a witness for the defense. Counsel for the defense said they knew nothing about the matter, and that was not what they said. A further adjournment was taken to Monday, at the time the Grand Jury will be present
